The first Internet café

A café with full Internet access (sometimes called a Cybercafé) was designed in early 1994 by Ivan Pope. He was asked to develop an Internet event for an arts weekend in London. Pope created a café with Internet access from the tables.

Inspired by this, the first commercial Internet café, called Cyberia, was opened later that year in central London. It quickly became the fashionable place to visit. Internet cafés soon extended across the world under a variety of names, for example the Binary Café in London, CompuCafé in Finland, etc. They have always been places to chat with friends, read newspapers and play games. Now there is less need for the Internet café because people can connect without paying in any place using their own laptops and iPhones.

The first search engine

In 1989 a young computer scientist from Barbados, Alan Emtage, built a single, easily searchable database for students to access information. He found himself at the heart of an Internet revolution. It didn't take long for search engines to become big business. Many more followed such as Excite in 1993, Yahoo in 1994 and Lycos also in 1994. With 60 million documents this was the largest of its time until Google was created in 1997. Google now has 620 million visitors every day.
